Earth Science At AIS

Ninth grade Earth Science students have really been busy for the past six weeks on a unit on Meterology at Appomattox Intermediate School.

If you have not visited the school recently, you are in for a surprise. Very rarely do you see classes lined up nearly or rooms so quiet you can hear a pin drop. In fact, perhaps you'd better stop in and see what's going on! On the other hand, that might not work either. For example, our classes could not be observed all at once except at the beginning and ending of the class periods. At other times they are all over the place.

During this unit two students, Keith Tweedy and J. T. Jones, working in cooperation with shop teachers, R. Q. Lawing and Barry Sauls, planned, purchased and constructed a thermascreen to house weather instruments as a permanent weather station for AIS. They also enlisted the aid of Building and Trades teacher, Mr. Almond, along with some of his students to construct the base for the screen.

Perhaps more interdisciplinary units can be worked in as time goes by.

At the same time that the previous activities were going on, other students were busy in either group or individual activities. Some were busy in the Viewing center with film strips, film loops overhead projector; some in listening center with tapes or discussion groups; some outside mading the temperature readings, barometric pressure readings, wind direction and velocity reading and relative humidity readings for the day. This was shared with other members of the class who recorded this information on a graph kept in individual folders.

Many students used the Media Center for doing research on unusual storms such as hurricanes and tornadoes. They made use of many different materials such as encyclopedias, newspapers, magazines and science books.

Each student worked on a contract basis electing the grade he wanted to work for. There were approximately thirty activities - ten required and twenty elective. Points were assigned according to the time and degree of difficulty involved. In this way individual needs and interests were met. Motivation was high as a student made choices and was involved at all times.

Each student was required to prepare a comprehensive test on the work he had done. He prepared an answer sheet and was tested, only on the work he had done. An easy way to help students succeed, an easy way to encourage excellance!

From this, you can see the role of the teacher has changed from that of lectures to a director or coordinator. Planning is vital to this sort of approach, so is flixibility and the ability to delegate responsibility, but at the same time it is necessary to maintain an awareness of what's going on at all times and be available to help or advise students when needed.

"What's next?" a happy interested student asks.
